

Elizabeth Davis

Regardless of robust programs and initiatives, the state of WA seems to be seriously considering allowing yet another fossil fuel company to pollute and destroy the Columbia River. The risk to marine life is extreme. The risk to plant and animal life is extreme. The risk to water for millions of people is extreme. The risk to sacred lands is extreme. There is no leeway here. There is no need for yet another dirty, contaminating terminal or other structure in WA. The state is not in need of the revenue, and when weighing cost versus risk, the revenue created does not in any way mitigate the impact this terminal will have on the people and ecosystem of the already fragile Columbia River.