

Leslie Honcoop

The proposed 500 gallon per day limit for indoor domestic use and outdoor watering is far too restrictive. It will not allow owners of small rural parcels to adequately water gardens, small crops or a couple of livestock. People will be unable to use their property to provide food for themselves in a sustainable way. This seems especially unfair when rural outdoor water returns to the aquifer as it filters through the ground. The regulation disadvantages those who intend to provide food for themselves and their families.