

Tom Colligan

The fundamental flaw to this approach is that the toxicity tests establishing these values were done using unweathered diesel and gasoline, in the environment, weathering significantly changes the composition of what discharges to surface waters - there must be a mention of this key assumption in that these concentrations are based on fresh samples and they may not apply to weathered.