

Phyllis J. Kardos

The EIS needs to include a thorough analysis of potentially impacted environmental justice communities including minority, low-income and indigenous populations from the source to the destination and each community needs to be actively participating in the permitting process.

Addressing acute impacts versus averaging is essential for environmental justice analysis. This analysis needs to include the coal source, crystalline silica source, charcoal source (Indonesia where forest are being depleted for the charcoal), plus wood chips.