

Andrew Stevens

The market is naturally gravitating towards clean energy and vehicles, but we are not yet at a point where we should start banning clean natural gas or fossil fuels. All this does is price people out of things and keep them using older, less efficient appliances and vehicles.

Instead, we should continue to make investments in efficiency with both gasoline and electrics until the market (not the government) decides its time to switch.

Please, dump the virtue signaling, and we can make strides together towards a clean energy future.