

Gregory Lawson

These rules take away freedom to choose which vehicles to buy and use. Let the marketplace decide, not government. It is impractical and not affordable for most families and individuals to buy electric cars. There is not enough electricity (infrastructure) to power an all-electric fleet, so government will be to ration electricity which will further limit freedom to come and go as we please. EV batteries are made with minerals that are mined with use of child labor and the mining is bad for the environment. China controls most of the mining done for these minerals. There is plenty of oil in the US to keep us powered for many years and using gasoline in ever more efficient vehicles is not affecting climate as much as we are led to believe. Tell China and India that they must first meet our pollution standards. I think this is another government power grab to control US citizens' lifestyles.