

Marcos Campos

I oppose mandating any percentage of electric vehicles. Creation of the car itself requires vast destruction to the environment in obtaining the rare earth minerals; often these minerals come from countries who are trying to dominate us. Mining companies often use child labor in unsafe conditions. I don't believe these cars actually lower overall air pollution. They would put a strain on the electric grid and would likely require coal fired plants to be brought on line. I have many allergies and since gas cars started using catalytic converters I have no problems. EVs punish the poor who struggle with money for rent and food. Our country needs to build many mini liquid fluoride thorium reactors to create clean inexpensive electricity. There is no threat from man-made climate changes from the USA. China and India are the polluters, creating coal fired energy plants with minimal environmental laws almost every week.