

Guy Chan

There will be, at least, tens of millions of fossil fuel powered vehicles around the world that will stick around for a long time. The bodies and the interior accessories of many of these vehicles will still be in reasonably good shape. Imagine the resources wasted if all these vehicles would be sent to the junkyard. I propose to ask car manufacturers to also develop affordable electric engines to replace existing gasoline engines. Can we also convince governments to help fund, at least in part, such projects?