

Leah Hadfield

Blindly following California's recent vehicle emission rule-making is short-sighted virtue signaling. Washington State is awash with regulation so burdensome that it makes doing business here distasteful. I hate the idea of wanting to leave my home town and state, but the "progressive" policies are not serving the public in the short or long terms. Electrical grid issues alone make such extreme rule-making a terrible plan. What ever happened to the middle road, the path that brings in the most people instead of exacerbating the fringe?