

Zack Zinter

Attempting to ban the purchase of gas-powered vehicles by the year 2035 is not only unconstitutional, it is based on a false economy. The processes for obtaining the materials needed to produce electric vehicles are not at all Earth-friendly. Neither are they people friendly for those engaged in the process. Further, many people cannot financially afford the cost of an electric vehicle. This is beside the fact that electric vehicles have a substantially shorter range of operation. In general, they just aren't up to the task. For these reasons, I am very much against any legislation intent on forcing people to buy what a government wants them to, instead of what the people choose.