

Dorothy Greenough

It is unrealistic to consider this at this time. We are too quick to jump the gun when it comes to issues such as all electric cars. It seems that the state does not look at the pro's and con's of switching at this time. People need to know if we switch to electric, what does that involve? How do they charge their vehicles in state and out of state. How does this affect the farmers who depend on the supply of gasoline to run their equipment? We depend more on the farmer than we acknowledge. Does the state raise gas prices so high that no one can afford to buy it or do we keep it reasonable for ALL users. I could go on and on. Frankly this needs to be a nationwide agenda, not one or two states. We need to get our heads out of the clouds and be realistic. Why is that so hard for government to understand. They're suppose to represent us, not themselves.