

Travis Wilbur

This mandate is a recipe for disaster.

It has been shown that these electric cars do not hold a charge for as long as necessary for any given operator. Long distance travel will be next to impossible. Charging times for these cars will be unbearable, preventing people from getting to and from their places of employment, where they earn their tax money that the government has become dependent on. There is also potential for the power grid to be overloaded due to overwhelming numbers of cars being charged all at the same time. Cars will frequently be out of power on the side of the roads with no access to chargers.

Further Jay Inslee needs to start using his head, start listening to the people he supposedly serves, and stop trying to copy the "cool kids" in California. The disaster that is California is not an adequate role model for Washington.

This mandate is a recipe for disaster.
