Can we get a state law that mandates stickers on dangerous items? It's getting absolutely exhausting having to scrutinize every friggin' label for ingredients, commit frequent offenders for adulterated good to memory cough cough Taylor Farms as well as all of their off-label brands cough cough Trader Joe's it feels like shopping has become a minefield except the landmines all have cartoon mascots and celebrity spokespeople.

A sticker that's applied on retail shelves would relieve so much cognitive load, especially for disabled people like myself where our eyesight already isn't very good and we already struggle with fatigue.

Or maybe a California-style Cancer disclaimer?
