Dan Smith

I've been informed the Master Builders Association has a campaign to loosen the laws in shoreline. Shoreline homes have never been affordable. They are crying for affordability when it doesn't make sense in shorelines. They have no proof, and don't have any science to show how they will help Ecology with maintaining the goals and policies of the shoreline management act. If you loosen the laws when you're under water already, you will open us to legal. I'm all about housing affordability, but they seem to not understand the systemic affordability problem that they've not advocated for at all. They don't care about affordability, they care about making money. Please stop letting corporations, associations, companies, people who aren't affected by the building within shorelines dictate what happens in the shoreline. They don't live in our cities, they don't understand our culture, they don't care if they fundamentally change the character of our neighborhoods.
