I think there needs to be improved funding and support to get grocery store items into food banks (in general more food banks would also be great) and to get ready to eat meals from food service providers (school districts, restaurants) to people who need the food. There are various nonprofits working on this that could use financial support to provide more workers or more storage facilities.

Another aspect of food waste comes from the home, I think increased access to compost through cities would be helpful. In addition there should be more information about "easy ways to reduce your food waste" like meal planning and how to properly store things, and information about "sell by" "use by" dates
