I have seen apps that notify volunteers when extra or excess food is available for pickup. The food is then taken to a redistribution center where its stored temporarily and then redistributed to people in need. In some cases I think the food is gleaned and then taken directly to the needy. "412 Food Rescue" App is one one great example. In Portland <http://urbangleaners.org/> is a very effective organization. Best of luck and glad to see the State of Washington stepping up its game on this issue!
