

Martin Lindenmeyer

Allowing Cooke Aquaculture to have a second chance after clear negligence in their prior operation in the Puget Sound is irresponsible. Triploid trout are genetically altered and not native to this region. This is no different than intentionally introducing invasive species. Granting Cooke permission to reestablish net pens is the opposite of conservation. They already got their chance and screwed up. Why should we trust them to get it right this time?