

George Lawrence

One of the conundrums associated with climate change is the threat to biodiversity and even survival of species. A widely quoted figure is that a million species may go extinct, although with my background in biology [academic medicine] I think that this is too conservative a figure. Clearly the rate of extinctions is at least a hundred-fold higher than the rate of new speciation. Senseless pollution of enclosed marine waters is reckless.