

Darron Davidson

As an individual, I believe that the cruise ships dump way too much waste into the ocean as it is. Not to mention the fact that as the vessels engines are running, they dump gallons of oil and fuel into the oceans as well. It's bad enough they do all this as they are travelling from port to port, but once they are in port, it gets worse. Because once they get into port they don't stop dumping wastes. Garbage, used fuel from the engines along with the oils. It's a toxic buildup that Harms the species of the area as well as the ecological and environmental damage that this does is getting to a point that cannot be reversed. Clean up, shut off the dumping when in port, or shut down completely. Pretty soon all these lovely ports won't be so lovely, and folks just won't want to go there. End of business. End of profits.