

Janet Rees

It is environmentally unacceptable for the cruise industry to convert its air pollutants created during fossil fuel combustion to wastewater that goes directly into the ocean. The buildup from scrubber dumping continues to grow, and it poses a threat to species such as endangered killer whales and other marine life. This discharge of scrubber wastes must be banned and a different, more environmentally friendly solution must be found to the pollution problem.