

Ben Walzer

The Cascade River is an amazing system, with fishing restricted to the extreme lower river, and salmon runs so highly proportionate and concentrated compared to practically any other Puget Sound watershed of the same size. Any protection that can be placed to preserve it's ability to remain that way is much appreciated, for the future always remains untold, and mankind's tendency to impede on the natural world will likely not diminish.

Any kind of settlement, construction or practice taking place within the Cascade watershed should be seriously monitored and limited to keep the water quality high enough to maintain the high level of salmonid reproduction we see into the modern age!

