

Andrew Frishman

In a time of dire statistics for Washington salmon populations, a new dam on one of the state's last free-flowing rivers is a terrible idea. Washington cannot currently afford a costly megaproject that will cause such damage to our ecology. The DEIS makes it clear that this project would have unacceptable impacts. The state should instead be pursuing less expensive and more ecologically defensible flood control solutions. Thank you for including my comment.