I don't understand why this project would go forward when a majority of the environmental impacts are "significant", "unavoidable", and have "adverse impacts". Why are Washington state and other funders giving so much money to restoration and salmon habitat when this project would wipe away so much of the good that has been done over the last 20+ years? It seems like a waste of money and habitat for minor flood relief for a limited number of residents. People can move, fish and other species can't.
