

David Camp

Speaking as an older Eastern Washington resident of limited means, I hope you'll help make electric vehicles more affordable. With the Federal government revoking its EV incentives, it's time for the state to step in, helping those of us concerned about climate change to make cleaner transportation choices that we cannot now afford to make.

I also hope that such incentives would be limited to lower-priced vehicles, especially newer ones with today's better battery range, given that so many of Washington's lower income residents live rural lives with long drives. There is no reason to subsidize $90,000 Teslas, but every reason to help lower income people give up old gas guzzlers for small, cost-efficient electric cars that reduce fuel and maintenance costs along with carbon emissions. We have some of the nation's cheapest, greenest electricity, so let's make good use of it!