

William Cameron

It seems to me that the finalization of any rule should be postponed until we know whether the Federal government prohibits California's ability to make stricter regulations. In any event, no stricter regulations seem appropriate until we can be assured that there are sufficient resources to ensure we can power our vehicles. Waiting to see what unintended consequences will almost inevitably occur could also be wise, as it seems California is now concluding that it cannot possibly provide power for the zero-emission vehicles it is demanding.