

James Mladenik

My general comment is that due to the slowdown of electric vehicle sales and limitations on the availability of renewable diesel, the chances of being able to meet the higher carbon-intensity reduction levels scheduled in the 2030s are not good. The state needs to be prepared to adjust those requirements in the event the credit bank declines to the point where fuel suppliers will not be able to legally meet them, which could restrict supply and raise costs to consumers.