The Delaware River Basin continues to be under threat by the oil and gas industry. The Delaware River supplies water to a large population, and any actions that endanger the quality of this water supply are irresponsible and must not be allowed. The oil and gas industry has a vested interest in exploiting the river and surrounding watershed as it has an ongoing need for water, and a need for a place to store contaminated water. However, the industry has a track record of failing to take adequate environmental protections and cannot be trusted to do better when it has every incentive to take shortcuts and be less than straightforward about the damage that will be done if extraction companies are able to have their way. The Commission owes it to the population to push back on fossil fuel extractors when it comes to endangering the Delaware River and its watershed.
