

Richard Grossman

Petroleum products survived trapped in shale because they are non-polar and do not react with polar rock surfaces. In the fracking recovery process, these products are driven out and replaced by salt water, a highly polar fluid. Replacement of the unreactive, trapped non-polar fluid with its opposite is almost a guarantee of future seismic activity. It should not be considered in populated areas.

Richard Grossman, PhD