Fracking techniques are an important part of our energy supply chain, but as poor practices by a loosely-regulated industry in Pennsylvania have shown, the lack of discipline in the removal, use and storage of fracking water can cause irreversible damage to sensitive ecological regions. So, while a complete ban on fracking might be unrealistic, the vital greater Delaware watershed is indeed one of those locations that can't be exposed to risk. Please tighten the regulations and requirements to keep our drinking water and our wildlife safe.
