

Jeffrey Popek

The fracking industry has used money and legal contracts to silence those whose water has been polluted by fracking practices. The fracking industry uses loopholes in laws to dispose of fracking waste water in ways that cause imminent danger to the public. To any reasonable person, these behaviors must shed serious doubt on any claims made by the fracking industry that they are willing to protect the environment. One only needs to look at the available scientific literature (not funded by the fracking industry) to understand the harm that the fracking industry has done to the groundwater in the communities where they are allowed to do business. Any use of water by the fracking industry results in threats to the people near and far of the actual fracking sites.