

Henry Berkowitz

In the few years that the fracking industry has been in existence, it has shown over and over again that it cannot be trusted or expected to take care of the environment in which they operate. Spill after spill added to illegal discharges, leaking methane, degraded forests, eroded lands, polluted air and water, plus a myriad of illnesses experienced by those who live near their operation. Until this industry shows that it can be trusted to be a good neighbor, anything to make their operations easier should be rejected.