

Rebecca Tversky

Once fracking pollutes our water or depletes it for solely business use, it would be difficult to correct the damage. Companies have not shown much interest in eliminating the risks of poisoning our environment or mitigating the risks where the costs burden them more than the public. Companies should not be free to use and damage public resources. Any regulations should build in strong protections for our communities, strong punishment for rule-breakers with real consequences, and adequate proof of company resources allocated for environmental protection under significant oversight, before being allowed to risk a permanent impact on community resources.