

Patrick Nagel

It's an absurd reality of modern day society, with the knowledge we have, and the damage we've done, that we are still here having to make and sign petitions to prevent more violent decimation of our only home because temporary profit outweighs long term existence. Who in their right mind would support any sort of oil exploration anymore? Who in their right mind would not push for renewables when we now have the proven technology to be better stewards of our environment, of all life, of the only known planet suitable for the only life we know. We are both victim and executioner. Yet we have the ability to be our own saviors. And save not only us, but the rest of the animal kingdom and the planet itself. We stand at a precipice, looking into the darkest recesses of our souls. Will we find the light within? Or will greed and power continue us on the inevitable path of our eventual demise? This is the choice we are making. Do we choose to live or commit mass suicide? The answer couldn't be easier.