

Logan Hurd

Please, keep fracking out of the Delaware River Basin. I previously lived in Greeley, Colorado, where much of the fracking innovation and law began, and from first hand experience I have seen it not only damage the wildlife, but also the community. Air pollution from fracking often caused headaches to me and residents and the increase in truck traffic to haul water and toxic runoff made our roads more dangerous resulting in several fatalities on rural roads. Though it did boost our economy, our town commerce became controlled by the volatile gas market and many civic projects were started and quickly lost funding. It made our town an eyesore and brought tension among residents. As a result I moved away and don't plan to return. I do not want the possibility of these things to happen in the lovely communities of the Delaware River Basin. Fracking has health risks, endangers citizens and makes a place far less desirable to live in.