Management of Produced water has been a constraining aspect regarding the feasibility to develop this asset, the state needs to work with the Operator toward solutions. If the WYDEQ has to cave to the vocal minority of pressures, I see no hope for the future of Wyoming. Changing the rules on the current permit makes no sense its giving a ticket to someone after changing the speed limit. After attending the meetings and educating myself the WDEQ did an exhaustive study lasting 10 or more years for the initial proposal and I do not understand after doing so much research just caving to a small vocal group. Just throwing away all of the tax paid for hard work on studying and preparing a decent proposal. This is Wyoming not California, not New York, our minerals/oil and gas is what we have to create economic stability. Just FYI I work out by these creeks that will be "polluted" there names are POISON CREEK and BAD WATER CREEK I wonder why, its not because of oil and gas exploration, just saying.
