Re: Public Comments - Wolf post-delisting planning

Dear Ms. Smith

My wife Debbie and I are writing today as a lifelong citizens of Eastern Washington, and retired business owners here of 28 years. We are also writing on behalf of those ~70% of Washington's citizens who want our gray wolf population to thrive.

We want to ask those of you who develop policy for managing wildlife in Washington State a very important question:

Why is the Washington Department of Fish & Wildlife spending tax dollars on post gray wolf recovery de-listing policies before recovery has taken place and is nowhere near to being in place yet?

It seems to us it would make far more sense to be spending our time and money on developing reasonable pre-recovery policies for managing our gray wolf population and toward mitigating the ongoing wildlife/livestock conflicts that result in killing the wolves we are working and (as taxpayers) paying to recover in Washington State?

After several years and ongoing efforts to better understand how to resolve these ongoing problems I've come to believe that Washington's Department of Wildlife and its director are more concerned with placating private ranching interests than they are in effectively managing our wolves and developing science-based policy to alleviate these conflicts that ultimately end in lethal removal of this precious natural resource. This approach would surely bring a real recovery much more quickly and effectively.

These private ranching operations that are seemingly being subsidized by our tax dollars are also destroying our publicly owned forest lands by grazing livestock in the middle of what used to be pristine forests and that are prime wolf (and other predator) habitat. These are areas where it's impossible to manage livestock and keep them safe.

The Lands Council in Spokane has developed what they refer to as their "Meadows Plan", based on empirical and scientific evidence of what can potentially resolve many of the problems that we are facing between wildlife and livestock interests. The Meadows Plan outlines areas that are manageable for grazing livestock and where ranching operations could easily keep their livestock together and safe from attack by predators, thereby protecting both the ranchers' investments and our precious wildlife and environment.

If WDFW are doing their job and working to execute their mission “to preserve, protect, and perpetuate the state’s fish, wildlife, and ecosystems” they should be working to better understand this plan and to working with The Lands Council and the USFS to get it implemented as quickly as possible.

The contact person for this plan is Chris Bachman, the Wildlife Programs Director at The Lands Council in Spokane. He has been instrumental in developing this plan and has met and discussed it with staff from WDFW and USFS. Please stop wasting our tax dollars on working for post-recovery delisting policies and get to work on recovering our precious natural wildlife resources!

What makes all of this even more frustrating and wrong is that science and empirical evidence have proven time and again that killing wolves over wildlife conflict does nothing to solve these problems, but instead makes matters worse. This is born out in the fact that wolves have been and continue to be lethally removed in the same areas of our state repeatedly with no long-term solution in sight. Areas where packs are obliterated just repopulate each time and WDFW goes back in and kills more wolves, over and over again. It’s overt brutality and borders on insanity.

It has been proven through scientific research that killing wolves disrupts the wolf family units, creates general chaos among the wolves, disperses packs (resulting in more new packs of wolves) and the results leave us with increasing numbers of dead wolves, increasing problems and no real solution in sight.

The efforts that WDFW have undertaken to date and are continuing to employ are wrong-headed and are wasting millions of taxpayer dollars to help a minute portion of our state’s economy while destroying one of our most precious of Washington State’s resources; our natural wildlife and our wonderful Pacific Northwest environment and culture. We want our natural wildlife to flourish!

Please, we implore you; Stop killing our wolves at the behest of private ranching interests whose cattle ruin some of the most beautiful and pristine public lands that our state holds. Stop putting private ranching interests above those of a huge majority of Washington residents and taxpayers!
Please stop killing our wolves!

Respectfully yours,
