While I do support some (mostly gamefish/game animals, good ROE) recovery/protection/monitoring/impact on other species, wild or domestic, some animals do not mesh well with previously established range or forrest animals. Resulting in the eventual destruction of the reintroduced animal. My mother and sister loved wolves. There is something wild, mystical, Native American, primal, unique, fascinating about wolves. So they located and acquired one. A young pup. While providing a thrill to say " I have a wolf", "We have wolves", many other relationships, family, friends, other animals that enter the yard, suffered neglect for various reasons. A parallel effect will happen with this program, when the thrill is gone (and gov oversight), people, usually the same that initially supported, will want to quietly exterminate. Moms wolf became uncontrollable. The end of her story was not nearly as thrilling as the beginning.
