

Mike Swint

Taking note from other states such as Idaho and Montana which have a lot more inhabited land for wolves to roam and hunt I believe the state is in trouble with the current rate of wolf growth. We simply do not have the wildlife resources for the wolf or grizzly bear for that matter to survive. The wolf will become over populated then the next thing you know the deer and elk will become endangered. The eastern Washington deer population is already at low numbers. You saw what happened to the timber caribou! We need proper seasons to keep the population in check. With out it the state will be forced to take out entire packs as they are doing now to keep what little control they have. I know this won't make headlines but please entertain the thought. Thanks