

George Wishon

Although some people say that we live in a democracy, the United states is actually a republic and that means that the rights of minority shall not be encroached upon by the majority. And that beans that the livestock owners have rights to their property and that the state should not be protecting an animal that is causing loss of their property and their annual income. The Washington state department of fish and wildlife should make sure that the wolf populations is limited to where there is no loss of any property with in the state. I think that this could easily be done by a wolf hunting season and by having affected livestock owners use traps to keep wolf populations to a manageable level to insure that the lands of Washington keep on producing. Another thing that needs to be done is that after the first livestock animal is killed by a wolf there should be complete wolf removal in that area.