I'm an avid big game hunter, and I believe our wild places should remain wild. What that means to me is responsibly having things like wolves and grizzlies and fishers. However, I see a big push to reintroduce all these apex predators but I'm not hearing much talk about growing their food source. These predators need something to eat. My other concern is population surveys. I know for a fact, that wdfw or anyone else can't give a very precise population count on the elk or deer or bears or cats so I don't believe they can really know how many wolves there are either. My point is that when wolves hit the west side where the brush and trees are thick the plane surveys won't work. my concern is they will kill a lot of deer and elk before the wdfw reacts.
