

Paige Wallace

Simple testing on a small Domestic population is a small price to pay for preservation of an Alaskan species so important the warrant the dedication of a 1.2 million acre park. We are an isolated location in which prevention of this disease should be straight forward with quarantine and testing of incoming populations. This is responsible ownership, epidemiology and conservation; it's a team effort to protect not only our domestic population but also our wild sheep.