

Dan See

The US Navy has housed reactors safely inside of ships, with hundreds of sailors in close proximity, for several decades. The risks are immeasurably low for health effects. Microreactors are a no-brainer for harsh weather remote locations. They provide a stable, secure source of energy with a very infrequent need for refueling.