

Jake Moe

As a licensed electrical engineer, I can say that microreactors are a technology Alaska should be using for alternative energy infrastructure that can diversify electric generation and potentially lower costs, lower carbon footprint, and increase reliability in many parts of the state. Since NRC will address the safety issues that come with any generation plant, DEC should craft microreactor siting regulations that aren't overbearing but rather be a resource where other agencies can inquire DEC for specific input.