

Candace Smith

Considering the state of the world today, with increased animosity and antagonism in some countries around the world toward the United States, especially in the far east, placing a nuclear reactor of any size would feel like a bull's eye on my back. I have lived 25 miles from Eielson for 32 years. My daughters went to school there. I am more than familiar with the area. If there were to be another war, God forbid, Fort Greely and Eielson would be targeted by missiles. What would they target in those bases? Fighter jets, ammunition storage, and the nuclear reactor would be the first to be destroyed. Eielson is flat with hills behind it. I realize they sometimes have a problem with inversion in the winter, but they have an excellent quantity of winds at other times. Why would they not consider wind turbines or multiple solar panels that would function well about 10 months out of a year? To sum it up, I am totally against nuclear-generated power.