Will this mean decreased monitoring of fuel tank farms in villages all over Alaska? Isn't that something the state has actively helped manage in the past?

What comes to mind, as a former remote city council member, is that details about communities are hard enough to follow for state service providers, but federal workers may be even less prepared for all the nuances of navigating the different communities. This feels like the kind of abdication of duties that will allow more contamination in remote areas to go unnoticed until bad things happen. If Fed's don't budge AND state doesn't budget, then rural AK once again gets abandoned. If there's clarification or correction you can offer me, please provide.

Thank you,
Lisa
