There should be more emphasis on helping consumers recycle. The flyer provided by my trash hauler, which is supposed to explain what is and isn't recyclable, is nearly useless. I can never be sure what should be recycled. And I never know where to dispose of batteries, CFLs, old electronics, or other unwanted but reusable items. Can this information be centralized somewhere and explained carefully? The same is true of every fast food restaurant I've been to. They all have three bins for waste, recycle, and compost, but absolutely no information about which of their food containers, cutlery, etc, are recyclable or compostable, and one look into the bins shows that people throw everything into all three. I don't see how you can reduce landfill usage unless the public is educated and involved, and this component is not emphasized in your plan.
