

Mark Schultz

The unnatural concentration of livestock in industrial operations is an unsound practice. The only winners are corporate executives and shareholders. The losers are those of us consuming unwholesome food, our soil, water, air, rural communities and the animals themselves. Instead of permitting more feedlots, why not concentrate your efforts on rewarding farmers who are trying to do it right, by grazing livestock with selective grazing practices that build healthy soil, eliminate runoff, and recharge wetlands and streams with clean water. I understand that corporations have political clout, but their methods are not wholesome or healthy.