

Karen Peterson

As a Girl Scout, many years ago, I was taught to leave my campsite in the same condition - or better - than when I found it so the space would be ready for the next camper. After gaining large profits from the use of the Mississippi River and nearby land, Ford also should be expected to remove all debris and toxic waste and leave Area C in as good or better condition than it was when they arrived.

What would it take for Ford to want to lead by example, do the right thing, and be responsible for cleaning up their own mess?

What would it take for Ford to want to leave Area C as beautiful and uncontaminated as they found it?

What would it take for Ford to believe it is worth the cost to leave Area C ready for those of us who remain, as well as those who come after, so we may safely enjoy its beauty?

What is necessary? What is right? I support a full clean up now.