

Dana Jackson

The Riverview dairy cattle expansion should not even be considered unless the business prepares a full environmental impact statement. This is not just a dairy expansion proposed, it is a huge animal factory expansion with a potential for disastrous impacts on groundwater for a large geographic area. The environmental impacts could be widespread in the soil and the air, as well as the surface and the groundwater. We have evidence of environmental damage done by largescale livestock facilities all over the nation, so why would we want to risk Minnesota's natural resources by allowing this gigantic animal factory. The Minnesota Pollution Control Agency should stop this now instead of working to control the pollution it will undoubtedly cause down the road.