

Louise Malecha

My name is Louise Malecha. I am a lifelong dairy farmer from rural Minnesota, a co-founder of a multi-generational dairy enterprise, and now a founder of a family-based food business rooted in agriculture.

Having spent decades in production agriculture, I understand firsthand the level of responsibility, planning, and stewardship required to operate a dairy of this scale. Modern dairy farms today are highly regulated, technologically advanced, and deeply committed to caring for their animals, protecting natural resources, and contributing positively to their communities.

Operations like West River Dairy represent more than agriculture—they represent opportunity. They bring jobs, support local businesses, strengthen rural communities, and help sustain the agricultural economy that so many families depend on.

In my experience, successful dairies are built on strong values: stewardship of the land, responsible nutrient management, animal care, and a long-term commitment to doing things right. Producers at this level understand that their livelihood depends on maintaining the trust of the community and protecting the resources they've been entrusted with.

I strongly support this project and believe it reflects the kind of thoughtful agricultural growth that can benefit both the local community and the broader region. It is important that we continue to support responsible farmers who are working to feed families while caring for the land for future generations.

Thank you for the opportunity to provide input.

Sincerely,
Louise Malecha
